Customer Reviews

Many preparedness books are full of lists that tell you what supplies you need to survive a coming zombie apocalypse, an epic climate change flash freeze, or a plain old everyday power outage. It's rare that you find a book that allows you to use things you'd normally throw away for survival purposes. However, Prepper's Survival Hacks by Jim Cobb is that rare exception to the preparedness book rule. You won't find lists of extensive supplies or pricey gear. Loaded with 50 do-it-yourself projects, this book has lists that read more like the contents of your trash can. Broken up into practical categories, the book contains projects relating to the following topics: Water Food Acquisition Cooking Fire Lighting Survival Kits The thing I like best about the book isn't just the projects, though. It's the whole MacGuyver-style mindset. Jim makes it seem easy to create what you need from what you have. (I'm not the world's handiest person, but I found the instructions super-easy to follow.)A review of Prepper's Survival Hacks wouldn't be complete without trying out one of the projects, so in the spirit of really testing out the book, we made the "Buddy Burner".Using a clean, empty cat food can, some old cardboard, some broken chunks of candle, and a couple of bricks that I grabbed from the garden, I made a nifty little stove.Did it work? Well, I timed it, and the Buddy Burner brought water to a boil on my counter in just over 3 minutes. To be exact. 3 minutes and 40 seconds.If you wanted more of a simmer than a boil, you could elevate your pan on another layer of bricks. Pretty awesome, and all made from stuff that folks would normally throw away.
